

Two large PSU banks may merge, says Vinod Rai

The two largest public sector banks based in India's financial capital are Bank of Baroda and Bank of India

Douglas Busvine | New Delhi October 11, 2016 Last Updated at 23:15 IST

The Centre may merge two large state-run banks in the coming financial year once a clean-up of bad assets has run its course, the official overseeing a turnaround of the sector told Reuters, days before a new process to resolve stressed assets goes live.

Banks Board Bureau chief Vinod Rai (Pic: Kamlesh Pednekar)

Consolidation of India's public-sector banks (PSBs) would represent a final step in rebuilding a financial system capable of underwriting credit growth and job-creating investment in Asia's third-largest economy.

First, though, the state-run banks must cleanse their balance sheets.

They accounted for 88 per cent of a pile of stressed loans that exceeded $138 billion in June, the legacy of a lending binge under the last government that has hobbled Prime Minister Narendra Modi's growth agenda.

Vinod Rai, the veteran bureaucrat hired this year to head a new Banks Board Bureau, said a next step could be the merger of "two large Mumbai-based banks" that he declined to identify.

"Once that consolidation has taken place, in the second phase, we will put a weaker, smaller bank into this merged entity," he said in an interview.

Rai declined to go into details, saying deliberations were preliminary and depended on the success of efforts to restructure the balance sheets of India's nearly two dozen PSBs.

Apart from market leader State Bank of India (SBI), now acquiring several affiliates, the two largest PSBs based in India's financial capital are Bank of Baroda and Bank of India.

Seeking resolution

Rai, a 68-year-old former auditor general, was hauled out of retirement to strengthen management at state banks that had often succumbed to political pressure to back projects that were not economically viable.

His mandate quickly grew, however, and a proposal to create an advisory committee that could review proposals to take write-downs, or "haircuts", on irrecoverable loans was enshrined in a Reserve Bank of India circular in June.

The Scheme for Sustainable Structuring of Stressed Assets, or S4A for short, survived a leadership transition at the central bank and is backed by its new governor, Urjit Patel, who announced after his first policy meeting last week that he would tweak its terms to make it more practical for banks.

"I have had detailed discussions with the new governor, who is totally on board," Rai said.

The two-man panel comprises ex-chief vigilance commissioner Pradeep Kumar and Janki Ballabh, previously SBI chairman, and will review its first three loan re-structuring cases next week.

"If bankers find that it is easy to use this channel to get a resolution, they will queue up," said Rai. "It takes the onus of the decision off their backs."

Bad bank debate

Starting from the 2017-18 financial year, minority shareholders in state-run banks will be encouraged to subscribe to rights issues — offerings of new shares — alongside the state.

Rai said these investments would be attractive because many state-run banks are valued at a discount to their book value. But this process should only move ahead once non-performing assets, or NPAs, are dealt with.

"Recapitalising the banks when they are carrying huge amounts of NPAs on their books makes no sense. It just gets lost into that big black hole."

Non-performing loans grew to 11.3 per cent of total loans at PSBs as of June.

India is fiscally constrained and, although Finance Minister Arun Jaitley has signalled he could inject more capital beyond the Rs 70,000 crore budgeted over four years to March 2019, that is nowhere near enough.

Rai played down reports the government was again considering a so-called bad bank as a repository for bad loans—an idea opposed by former Reserve Bank of India chief Raghuram Rajan.

India already has 15 so-called asset reconstruction companies, and setting up another one and loading it up with non-performing loans "would be a futile exercise", he said.

---

Reuters